Bridging the Potomac

A letter from Washington to the Mid Continent, of St. Louis, says: "Much interest is being shown in the resolution of Senator Butler adopted by the Senate, reviving the project of a grand bridge across the Potomac nearly opposite the White House. This was known as the Grant Memorial Bridge, and the bill in its favor passed the Senate two years ago but was crowded out in the last hours of the House. Senator Butler's resolution directs the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress upon the most suitable bridge and approaches to cross the Potomac at a point west of the State Department, to the national cemetery in Arlington, Virginia. There is a broad sweep of virtual park from the Capitol a full mile to the White House, and thence to the Potomac river opposite to where Arlington cemetery stands. This park includes the Horticultural Gardens, the Smithsonian Institution with its splendid grounds, the Agricultural Department also handsomely laid off and kept with the park surrounding the Presidential mansion itself. The extension of this wide strip so that the river and up the banks on the opposite side, with the splendid views of the city behind, the river below, and the Arlington Heights and the wonderful Virginia hills before, would perfect the park and make it superior to anything of the kind in the land. There are only two bridges in fact, leading to Virginia from the city; the Long Bridge which is far down at the lower end of the city and along which the railroad runs so closely as to destroy all pleasure, not to mention safety, in riding for recreation or health. Then the old Aqueduct Bridge, as it is called, is as far up as the Long Bridge is down, at the upper end of Georgetown, and lately opened as a free bridge. Several miles above is the Chain Bridge.

Access to Virginia has been strangely enough neglected during all the years since the war. In the District itself and in Maryland adjoining, on the same side of the Potomac, land has risen vastly in price, and the improvement that ought to be encouraged, surrounding the national Capitol have rapidly progressed. But across the famous stream everything has been sadly neglected. The country and the resources of its owners were literally exhausted in the terrible strife and the still more terrible camping around on these Virginia hills. A person looking out, as so many of our countrymen do, across the Potomac from the dome of the Capitol, sees two ranges of hills, known as Arlington Heights, rising and rolling back from the river in scenery as attractive as the famous Acadia. Lovely views across the river from many points in the city, and lovely views of the city and of the surroundings from points opposite are everywhere to be seen. We walked, some time since, with a friend along the second range, rising back of the Arlington Cemetery itself, about a mile. From any point on that level plateau Washington city in great part was visible. The Capitol building, the Washington monument, public buildings of marble and granite shone white in the sun, while hundreds of spires and towers rose into the sky. Will it be believed that all this charming country is almost uninhabited? Not for health reasons, for these heights are remarkably healthy, with their pure air. But simply and solely because they have been kept inaccessible by national refusal to relieve the poverty of the Virginia exiles. Many negroes have come over here and camped out, cutting the young trees down and casting them off to sea, laying hands on what they could find to eat, and suffering many of the evils of poverty incident on unwillingness to work or the inability to find labor. Such a condition is a shame to the great Capital of the United States and should not be allowed to remain a day longer. Arlington Cemetery itself, where sleep 15,000 Union soldiers, many of them officers, in graves visited by tender remembrance and which is to become a nation's burial place still for many of her noble sons—this cemetery itself should be made accessible to the thousands who wish to visit it with respect. Were it so, hosts of visitors to the capital would eagerly cross to stand beside the buried heroes. It is only just to Virginia also, burdened heavily with debt, that the national sympathy should be extended to her by this access and opening up of her territory adjacent to the capital that would be effected by the building of this bridge, central to the city and to the country that sleeps in beauty and, alas, in seclusion, "all quiet along the Potomac." The movement of Senator Butler should find expressions of approval from all parts of the land and from all our citizens.
